The right characteristic to get is the one shown, and that is quite easily obtained with a phase advancer provided with a field winding. When the motor is running light it is feeding a leading current of a certain amount. Perhaps an 800-h. p. motor could feed 300 k. v. a. leading into the mains, neutralizing the bad power factor of other motors in the vicinity; and as the load comes on (notwithstanding that the leading current increases slightly) the power factor becomes nearly unity. That characteristic is, I think, one that is to be aimed at in many cases, and it can be easily obtained by means of the right phase advancer, either of the Scherbius type or the British Westinghouse type. With regard to Mr. Ashtons remarks about condensers, I am very glad to hear that condensers can be...
